To Whom It May Concern:

As Director of The Princeton Review Taiwan, I am delighted to write this letter of reference for Chris Holland.

I've known Chris for the past year and a half, and as one of his supervisors during his tenure as a summer teacher with us in 2007, have interacted with him on a regular basis. Over the past 10 years I have hired and managed more than 350 teachers for Princeton Review offices in Asia. Reviewing Chris's performance and professional responsibility within the context of this group, I can easily say that he is an innovative self-starter, with strong motivation to accomplish his goals. He is professional, energetic, organized, and communicates in an articulate fashion.

Chris taught a number of SAT courses for us during the summer of 2007. He also completed training with us and was certified to teach TOEFL, SAT Subject Tests in Math and Physics, and Targeted Learning classes in Reading, Vocabulary, Writing and Grammar.

Working in an ESL environment at our center, Chris was aware of and responsive to students' varied learning styles and processes. As a teacher, he was able to guide and coordinate lessons in a way that was uniquely tailored to the needs of his students. He challenged students to reach for their own goals, while providing guidance that allowed them to grow at their own pace with confidence. He was considered very approachable by his students, making time to meet with them outside of class and following up on their individual progress.

I'd like to emphasize that Chris is a well-rounded and motivated teacher. With his multi-cultural perspective and international experience, I am confident he will enrich the learning experience of his students. Chris is the type of person who will naturally put his versatility and team spirit towards the success of his students and colleagues alike.
